NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY STUDY

We have had several questions raised about the Northwestern Health Study during the Question and Answer sessions of the "State of the Plant" meetings. Here is a reprint of an article we ran last December 16 about this study:

Northwestern University will be contacting former and current employees of the Krummrich plant as part of a study to learn more about the effects of chlorophenols, chlorophenoxy acids and their dioxin contaminants on the health of chemical workers. It is anticipated that approximately 1,500 current and former employees will be asked to participate in a day of interviews and medical examinations. Those asked to participate will be scientifically selected from lists of employees in such a way that ensures a cross-section of different departments and different periods of employment. Participation is, of course, completely voluntary.

Exams are scheduled to begin at the end of this month and conclude in mid-May. The examining facility will be located on the East side, not far from the plant. The exams are free to employees and will be conducted on company time. All participants will receive a copy of their individual results.

Information collected on individual workers will be held in strict confidence. This information will be combined with the information of many other workers and will be reported only in the form of summary statistics. The findings of this study will be reviewed by a select group of medical professionals, including a consultant for the I.C.W.U. Findings of the study are expected to be announced in 18-24 months. This study is supported by Local 12 and the I.C.W.U.
