Subject: Basic Training Course
Environmental Health Monitorin

In past correspondence, we have indicated the intent of OSHA to promulgate permanent health standards requiring, among other things, the routine periodic monitoring of worker exposure to over 400 potentially harmful substances. The standard-setting process is now well underway, and standards covering many substances are expected to become Federal law within one year.

In anticipation of these requirements, basic monitoring training courses and follow-up refresher courses have already been conducted to train plant personnel in proper monitoring techniques. However, since the permanent health standards are likely to increase this activity at most of our facilities, additional trained personnel will be needed. Therefore, the basic two-week monitoring training course is being offered again, with the tentative date being December 1, 1975. The location of the course, and the dates and locations of additional courses will be based on response to this notice. To register participants, submit the attached registration form as soon as possible.

Note that at many of our facilities, compliance with the monitoring requirements of the permanent standards will likely require the services of one or more employees on a full-time basis. When selecting course participants, the future full-time nature of the job should be considered.
