since the enforcement of a new law which says that whites may let only one manhire domestic live on their premises.

The law aims to get as many nonwhites as possible out of the predominantly white cities and towns at nights—back to segregated townships.

Many hundreds employ more than one African domestic. Most live in separate accommodation in their employer's compound.

Whites like it that way. It means that servants are handy early morning and late at night. They generally have a short break in the afternoon.

The Johannesburg city council has told citizens who accommodate more than one servant that they will not be prosecuted for at least a year. There just

The council plans to build five big hostels for displaced servants, but these cannot be started until the next fiscal year begins in July, 1958.

There is a similar situation in other South African cities. Even where the accommodation problem is overcome, the authorities will have a headache providing transportation for nonwhite servants between the segregated townships and their places of work.

An experienced living-in maid is paid about $28 a month plus food supplied by her employer. Many are paid less.
