government.

Those were the people who could belong to the ACGIH, vote, belong to its committees and things like that.

Now, Owens-Illinois, my client, employed an industrial hygienist. And I will talk to you about him a little more later in detail. His name was Willis Hazard.

Mr. Hazard, during a period of time during World War II, left our employ and served in the United States Public Health Service.

At the time he was doing his service for our country, he was a member of the ACGIH. Mr. Hazard was aware of the TLVs, and he applied them in the work that he did for Owens-Illinois.

Now, this ACGIH, this independent organization, what they said about TLVs were that they represented conditions under which they felt it was safe for workers to be repeatedly exposed day after day to a certain substance, without injury to their health.
