present wartime demands has made a deep impression. Farmers are producing at levels never before approached. Yet there are no surpluses, except for an occasional perishable commodity.

FULL EMPLOYMENT

A prime reason is found in the fact that there is full employment in the cities at good wages. Millions of consumers have, for the first time, the money to buy the food they need and want.

But some farm organization leaders believe there is need for more than political promises of full employment in the post-war period. They believe the Government should stand ready, in case of consumer inability to purchase agriculture's full production, to prevent a collapse in farm income and prices such as occurred after World War I.

Earl Smith, vice-president of the powerful American Farm Bureau Federation, advocates, for example, a post-war crop control program modeled along the lines of the AAA, except that it be administered by a bi-partisan board, with members holding office for substantial terms on a staggered basis. (The AAA is directed by the secretary of agriculture.)

Smith asks also that State and
