The image score is calculated from the ratio of favorable to unfavorable impressions of each personality. Thus, an image score of 100 means that as many people have a negative view as a positive view of the person; a score of 200 means that favorable impressions are double that of unfavorable impressions, etc.

An examination of the differences in identification ratings and image scores surfaces some revealing findings:

While Brown has a respectable image score of 270 among Democrats, his unfavorable to favorable opinion ratio among Republicans yields an unfavorable image score of 60.

Bradley, on the other hand, while not as well-known as Brown is currently highly regarded among both Democrats and Republicans achieving image scores of 620 and 520 respectively.

Hayden is relatively well-known throughout the state, but achieves a relatively low image score (110) among Democrats and an even lower "rival party" image score (30) among Republicans.

	Identification rating	Strongly favorable	Somewhat favorable	Somewhat unfavorable	Strongly unfavorable	Image score
