trines. Those on the right, however, persisted in their paganism.

On the right bank, below what is now Drachenfels, lived a terrible dragon, according to the legend. Human sacrifices were made to this dragon.

One fateful day, a beautiful maiden was offered as a sacrifice. As the hideous beast approached to devour her, she held out her golden crucifix and the monster fell into the Rhine, dead.

The heathens who witnessed this were so impressed that thereafter they accepted the teachings of Christ. The maiden, of course, married one of the chieftains who built for her Drachenfels. From this castle their descendants ruled for 1,000 years, so the story goes.

The reception given in Bonn to President Eisenhower and his party was an exciting thing to witness. With an introduction from the American Embassy, I was able to get credentials from the Press and Information Office of the Federal Government which gave me a front row seat at the Wahn airport as well as a seat in the White House press bus which followed the President's car.

All along the 22-mile route to the temporary residence of the President in the house of the American Ambassador in Bad Godesberg, the people cheered President Eisenhower and Chancellor Konrad Adenauer. One sign declared: "We like Ike and Conny!" Everyone seemed to be waving miniature American and German flags.

The expression on the faces of the people who lined the route was one of sincere joy. The White House press contingent estimated the crowd at 250,000. The European edition of "Stars and Stripes" said there were 300,000 people out to greet the President, while the German press estimated 400,000.

I haven't any idea of how many people turned out, but it was a goodly number.

My first impression of the Germans was that they are a most aggressive, industrious people. Everyone seemed to be working hard and the fruits of their labor as evidenced by the restoration are everywhere.

In retrospect, the French—despite history — appeared to me not to like Americans and they were quite open about it. The Belgiums were more friendly and the Spanish even more so. But to my mind, the Germans are a question mark. Perhaps my opinion is warped
