little fat captain might not have escaped from the fierce brigands.

But, when the fierce brigands rushed to where the Raggedys and the captain sat eating ice cream from a chocolate ice cream mad puddle, the hobby horse gave the fierce brigands many hard thumps with his [illegible] little fat captain and Raggedy Andy pelted the brigands with snowballs made out of chocolate ice cream.

Then, while the brigands were wiping the ice cream from their eyes, the Raggedys and the little fat captain hopped upon the back of the hobby horse and dashed away through the woods.

"Now, we must try to find out where 'Watch Tower Hill' is," Raggedy Ann said. "For that is where the map shows that a whole lot of treasure is buried. And if we do not find it very soon, I am afraid that the fierce brigands will find it and take it all for their very own. And they are such selfish creatures, I am sure they would spend every single golden penny for selfish things."

"I am sure they would," the little fat captain agreed. "They took my [illegible] know where 'Watch Tower Hill' is [illegible] a long time, the magical hobby horse stopped; not that the hobby horse was tired, for he was a magical hobby horse and did not get tired, but he stopped because he had run so hard, and had jumped over so many sticks and stones he knew that he had bumped the Raggedys and the little fat captain about so much, the jiggling must have made them very tired. The jiggling did make the little fat captain tired, but, of course, it did not make the Raggedys tired, for they were made of cloth and stuffed with nice white cotton and bouncing and bumping about never bothered them at all.

So, when the magical hobby horse came to a stop, it was right beside another little path which led from the main path through the woods. "This will be an easy way to throw the fierce brigands off our track," Raggedy Ann said. So they all walked up the little path until they came to a queer house with a sign upon the front door. "Walk right in," the sign read.

So the Raggedys and the little fat captain walked right into the queer little house and as soon as they were inside the door slammed behind them with a bang and they knew they [illegible] long ago and I [illegible] another place. Now, I shall keep you prisoners here and I will take the treasure away from here and spend every single golden penny myself."

So he pushed the Raggedys and the little fat captain in a dark closet and locked the door.

"Now, I shall run down to the sea and throw the key in the deepest place so you will never be rescued," he cried as he went out of the front door.

"My goodness," the little fat captain [illegible] we do now?"

And although the Raggedys tried to comfort him, they themselves wondered the same thing.
