manufacturer stops making the product as intermediate sellers have the same duty as the manufacturer where the resale is without change in the product.

With regard to strict liability, if a product is defective when sold by a manufacturer because of a lack of warning as to its dangerous characteristics, although it should have had a warning in light of state of the art, and if the product reaches the plaintiff without substantial change, middlemen or intermediate sellers of the defective product are strictly liable to the plaintiff just as the manufacturer is liable to the plaintiffs.

The defendant's duty to provide a nondefective product and to warn of the dangers of a product is nondelegable.

In other words, a defendant may not defend itself in these cases by claiming that it did not provide a warning because another person or company had the duty to warn of the dangers of the defendant's asbestos-containing products.

The duty of the installer or supplier to