OAKLAND

Oakland has wakened up. It owns its own waterfront, and it is improving it. It has land for its factories, warehouses and docks, and rail facilities to help them. It wants new people and new industries to employ them, and it is offering favorable inducements to attract manufacturers of every kind through its various commercial agencies.

Oakland at this time presents to the manufacturer, the builder or the shipper the greatest advantages of any city in the world, and all it asks is a chance to tell of its offerings.
