FIRE ALARMS INSIDE HOMES

The fire alarm, long a familiar fixture of the American street corner, is moving into the American home.

Millions of homes have equipped their homes with alarms since the end of World War II, and a number of homes built after the war are installing them as standard equipment in new models, according to the manufacturer.

These fire alarms differ in two major respects from their outdoor counterparts. First explained, he said, these devices detect smoke from automatically and sound a sharp warning to occupants and neighbors.
