Water Authority submits out their differences over San Diego's long range water development policy, William E. Warne, assistant interior secretary, said today.

Backed by the San Diego Chamber of Commerce Water Committee and the Water Authority, the Bureau had embarked on preliminary phases of a project to double the aqueduct's capacity. But it halted operations when the City Administration unexpectedly opposed the second-barrel plan and said it wouldn't be needed for the next 30 years.

The City's statement puzzled Warne and bureau officials, in view of near-drouth conditions in the San Diego area.

Warne said that in a telephone conversation with Joseph Burkholder, the San Diego Water Authority manager-engineer, indicated the Authority and the City were moving toward a patchup of their squabble over water development policy.
