Today on Climate Beat . . .

. . . we got litigious, reporting that a developer of a failed carbon capture and sequestration project in Texas has launched a suit against the Department of Energy, charging that the department breached a contract with the developer when it pulled federal support for the project last summer.

Staying in court, environmentalists have filed suit trying to force a legally binding deadline for EPA to respond to their years-old petition asking the agency to issue rules to reduce greenhouse gas and conventional air emissions from concentrated animal feeding operations, after a previous similar deadline suit failed on procedural grounds.

We highlighted several must-read stories from the past week about GHG analysis for fossil infrastructure project reviews, as well as updates on methane regulation, new Northeast cap-and-trade targets and the Energy Department's grid study.

And our daily news roundup looked at an op-ed by a former Exxon-funded scientist, as well as updates on the social cost of carbon, the Clean Power Plan and Hurricane Harvey.
