Drinkin' Habits

There is such a thing as a stimulant's conversation, but I have yet to see an argument help a man's appetite.

Last night, for instance, the joint was nearly full. Jake Dolan, my partner, and me figured we'd work off half a dozen extra pats we were stuck with. The customers were munchin' away and everything was just fine.

"Coffee is had for you," one customer says all of a sudden to another one alongside him.

"No such thing," the other guy retorts. They're off — joined by the whole counter takin' one side or the other. Business just died.

"How would everybody like a cup of joe?" I finally blurt out.

"Sure stuff," somebody snaps at me.

"Don't you call the Irish no sinners," Thomas Rafferty, the truck driver, yells. "There is more tea drunk by the Irish than anybody, nearly."

I see a car drive up on a park outside. It belongs to Professor Dodge from over at the University.

"Listen, you guys," I say, rappin' on the counter. "Here comes the real answer. Professor Dodge is a very smart guy and he is just comin' in. He is very careful of his health, so why don't you sports lay even money on whether he takes coffee, tea or milk."

By golly, it works! Before the Prof gets in, they get quarters up with Jake holdin' stakes.

"Coffee, tea or milk, Professor?" I ask him part of m'head.

"Why, Wally," the Prof says, "you wouldn't have a nice bowl of soup, would you?"

We had. One after another of the boys orders soup also.

"Well," I say to Jake when the crowd breaks up, "I guess we better have a slice of pie. I'm havin' coffee with mine."

"I'll take tea," Jake says. — WALLY BORN
