interpret x-rays which are taken as part of the preemployment, periodic or special medical surveillance programs or for evaluation of workplace injuries or illness. X-rays which are taken for other reasons should be interpreted by a radiologist or by the employee's personal physician.

2. Each site will assure that the x-ray equipment used is proper for the task and properly maintained and that the persons making and developing the x-rays are adequately trained to produce x-rays of acceptable quality.

The arrangements for interpreting x-rays will vary, depending on local circumstances in the community in which the plant is located. These can best be determined by the plant physician but should include consideration of

- having the radiologist come to the plant one or more times per week, or
- having the x-rays interpreted in the radiologist's office or the local hospital.

Frequently special fee considerations can be negotiated, depending on the number of films to be read and the procedures which can be arranged with the radiologist.

A written report of the radiologist's interpretations should be placed in the employee's medical record folder. The employee, former employee or applicant who is the subject of
