Subject: Re: SF NPR affiliate--urgent need for Wilcox statement on barred journalists from water contaminant summit

“The first day of EPA’s National Leadership Summit was open to a wide range of groups, including the press, and allowed the opportunity for stakeholders to present concerns and discuss the most pressing needs in addressing PFAS and protecting public health. Both state and federal officials had the expectation that the second day of the Summit would be a government-to-government discussion between federal and state co-regulators who are working together to address this important issue.” – Peter Grevatt, Director, Office of Ground Water and Drinking Water

"The National Leadership Summit on PFAS scheduled is not a federal advisory committee event. The purpose of this event is for EPA's state, tribal, and federal government partners and national organizations to share a range of individual perspectives on the Agency's actions to date and path forward on PFOA/PFAS. The Agency looks forward to hearing from all stakeholders on these crucial issues." - EPA Spokesperson
