Legume Crop Menace Told

RIVERSIDE. — Repeated cropping to varied legumes permits the Pythium fungus species to multiply and increases root rot, Dr. J. T. Middleton told the Seventh Annual International Botanical Congress meeting in Stockholm, Sweden.

Dr. Middleton is plant pathologist at the Experiment Station on the Riverside campus of the University of California.

The Pythium species causes root rot in many legumes which are important crops for seed and hay in California. Seven species are found on diverse legumes, six generally on sweet clovers, kidney and lima beans, cowpeas, chickpeas, and peas.

The activity of the Pythium species varies with the host plant, the plant pathologist states in his report. Severity of root rot depends on susceptibility and soil temperature.
