

Conclusion

The Canadian asbestos mining industry has a long history of manipulation of scientific data to create outcomes that support claims that their product and the methods used to mine it are safe. Careful analysis of their data brings us to the conclusion that this is not so. Until these spurious studies are identified and corrected, injured workers will have no means of recompense, and potentially fatal mining practices will continue.