Agencies leaning into shared services for reform plans - Fedscoop - Aug 9, 2017

"There's a month left before agencies submit finalized reform plans to the Office of Management and Budget, and officials are pointing to shared services as key to making those plans work. Shared services will help agencies reduce redundancies and achieve the efficiencies the Trump administration seeks in its governmentwide reorganization, announced in April", Beth Angerman, executive director of the Unified Shared Services Management office, said Wednesday.

Learn How "Shared services will help agencies reduce redundancies and achieve the efficiencies" at the Potomac Forum Training Workshop for Government from Government and Industry Experts

Overview:

This workshop will focus on the Office of Management and Budget's recent April 2017 memo calling for a Comprehensive Plan to Reform the Federal Government. This one day course is designed to offer a framework into how category management and shared services can serve as enablers for improving the efficiency and effectiveness of agencies, one of the four categories each agency is required to address and align to its mission, role, and performance. Category management and shared services are highlighted in the memo and will be discussed in detail to help give participants a blueprint into how to plan, design, implement, and customize their approaches to obtain measurable improvements.

Course instructors are experts in their field and will discuss both their federal and private sector experience implementing category management and shared services initiatives. A panel of government experts will also share their insights, highlights, challenges, and lessons learned, particularly in the context of complying with the new Administration's requirements.

What You Will Learn:

Learn how to adopt the principles of category management and shared services from subject matter experts with substantial experience implementing change in government organizations successfully. Understand how these two business models can help your organization save money and conserve resources while delivering your mission.
