RE: OSHA Standards

This is to amend my last memo. Kaye Crooks interprets the law to require compliance from the installer or contractor (us) as well as from the owner (the customer).

Therefore, all of our bids will be to OSHA standards, whether the customer requires it or not.

The law also applies to any present work contracted prior to the effective date of the law. Please review your jobs and contracts for OSHA problems.

M & R STATE:

Federal law recently created new employee safety standards -- OSHA standards, standing for Occupational Safety and Health Act -- which will have an impact on your future bids in two areas:

- Material supply such as clearances on walkways, ladders, stairways, etc., and size of handrails, etc.
- Labor cost, due to extra safety measures such as nets, temporary railing, etc.

All future bids should conform to OSHA unless specifically excepted by the customer, and your bids should state OSHA standards will be met in the material and labor quoted.

Be certain that all Work Orders and requests for estimates (especially to Construction) specify OSHA standards.

The standards are a book several inches thick. Nick Alexanian and Construction can answer questions in their technical areas.
