land obtains again a freedom of decision to go ahead and regain her former strength and superiority over the seas.
The fact that a French and English naval pact exists proves that it is aimed against a third power, which can only be America. The object of the pact evidently is to guarantee mutually the French land forces and the English naval armaments.
The strategic value for France lies in the support by English ships of the line in the Mediterranean, and France therefore will build only cruisers and submarines, which in turn will aid England in the protection of her commerce.
The ratio of naval strength, according to the Washington treaty, joint use of their fleets, and makes possible the joining of a third power in the pool of the fleets. The possibility of a combination between England, France and Japan raises their combined strength to a ratio of nine and three-quarters to five for America.
