"Dangerous to Know" Screened

"Dangerous To Know," which opens tomorrow at the State Theatre, is a powerful story of a racketeering political rajah, whose "Achilles Heel," a burning desire to get into society, brings about his downfall.

Akim Tamiroff, known to moviegoers everywhere as the general of "The Conquest of Peking" and, most recently, as Fredric March's lieutenant in "The Buccaneer," vividly brings out the character of the boss of a typical American city, urbane, power-mad, unscrupulous.

Anna May Wong, the exotic Chinese star, is seen as the racketeer's lifelong friend and adviser, whom he thrusts aside in his climb up the social ladder and who finally gets her revenge in a strange way in keeping with her oriental background.

Although he has the entire city firmly under his foot, Tamiroff meets his match for the first time in Gail Patrick, a beautiful and haughty member of the country club set. Her beauty and social position have a fatal charm for the political ringmaster, who wants to forget that he came from the wrong side of the track.

When Miss Patrick repulses his advances and goes on with her plans to marry a penniless young bond salesman, played by Harvey Stephens, Tamiroff sets out to stop her by the same method he might use against a rival gang of bootleggers; He frames her fiancé and gets him accused of stealing a fortune in bonds. Holding the fate of the man she loves over her, he has Miss Patrick just where he wants her.

But Miss Wong, whom jealously fires with a sudden sense of justice, determines to end the boss's career of plunder and murder before it can go any further. She frames him as he has framed many men, and makes him pay for one of the few crimes in the community he did not commit.
