 Although the scene is transferred to New York, thus eliminating unmanageable accents, the play remains entirely English. The best of English mystery plays explore psychology in crime in a leisurely style; in an improbable situation like this one, the American shotgun tempo of speech and action would be livelier.

But the play offers a variety of parts: colorful characters like the hard-eyed fence by Morton Lichtman; Jacob Forbes Forbes drawing some sympathy as a heart-patient burglar; Francis Seago making the most of every line given him.

David Meblin gives the law and order side some color, too, and Frank Burnett as the lawyer, both caught in the dilemma of being friends of the amazing doctor. There are only two women: Kay Pontius as the devoted nurse to Dr. Jekyll and Jan Pitre, who makes the gang headquarters for Mr. Hyde.

Carroll Alexander's sets—a consulting room, a hangout, a fancy apartment, a warehouse roof—are good in four different ways. The roof scene is so well done that the audience joins in shushing a loud-speaking crook. The movie-trained audiences must find the stage way of breaking up a story rather odd.

Dr. Clitterhouse may be no ornament to his profession, but the exhibit of doctors' art, in the theater lobby, by Doctors Russell Roach, Thomas Stevenson and Wesley Wright certainly is.
