Adolphe Menjou and Ricardo Cortez are teamed on the American screen in "The Swan."

One of the few men in show business who has always admitted with the most disarming frankness that he is in it for the money, is Jules Leventhal—Uncle Jules to many an actor who has appeared under his banners.

Long ago he came to the conclusion that there was more money to be made taking over the touring rights of Broadway hits and playing them in the immediate vicinity of New York at popular prices. As a result he built up the "subway circuit," with most of his stands available by subway; and through the years he has prospered.

It is common knowledge that Leventhal drives hard bargains, has his office under his hat, looks more like a fifth-rate Fuller brush man than a millionaire; but that the fact remains that he is one of the few producers whose word is not only as good as his bond, but who can secure a casting bond from Equity merely by telephoning.

All this is prelude to the announcement that Leventhal has decided to get in on some of the easy money that is floating around Broadway, a precinct he normally avoids as he would the plague.

He has found a musical comedy in which he is interested and which he will produce. It is called at the moment "Song of Vienna" and is the work of George Marion Jr. who did the book; Karl Farkas, who turned out the lyrics, and Rudolf Kalman who did the music.

Never above hiring top-drawer actors, although his groans at the salary demands have been heart-rending, Leventhal has begun his casting by hiring Joan Roberts who created the role of Laurey in "Oklahoma."
