← AREA 1—West Virginia, Maryland, Delaware and New Jersey

Only the Ohio Valley counties of West Virginia will get normal amounts of rain this April. Elsewhere rainfall will be sparse, relative humidities will be low and there will be unusual freedom from fog. The month will start off very warm with almost unprecedented heat. But much colder weather will follow immediately, bringing widespread frost throughout the region. All of these variations will average out to about normal temperatures in the east, but somewhat above normal west of the Appalachians. These are trend forecasts, so don't expect precipitation or extreme temperatures on every day of the intervals blocked out.

← AREA 2—Pennsylvania and New York

Though New York can expect above-normal rainfall during April, amounts will fall off to well below normal in southern Pennsylvania. The Susquehanna and Delaware River valleys in particular are expected to be dry. Heaviest rains are expected in the vicinity of the Great Lakes. Temperatures will be above normal, especially in the west, but the averages will cover a lot of variations. Though the month will start off warm, in fact quite hot, this weather will give way to considerable cooling and general frosts. Frosts may be expected again around the 20th, and could cause extensive damage to tender plants. Much warmer weather will follow.

← AREA 3—New England

New England should have normal April weather in nearly all respects this year. Moisture will approximate normal, although there will be a tendency toward above-normal amounts in the St. Lawrence Valley. You can expect considerable snow for so late in the season, with a definite possibility for a snow storm the first week of the month. However, the moisture will be reasonably well distributed throughout April with no extended dry periods. Temperatures will alternate frequently from warm to cool, but the month will be relatively free of extremes. There will be some freezing temperatures during the early April cold snap and again about the 20th but no serious damage is likely.
