regards membership in 1956 and '57, why was there considerable activity, to your knowledge?

A I have no idea. Let's say there were four or five members coming in and going out, that was considerable compared to the year that there would be nobody coming in and out, so that was considerable so I used those words.

Q From your knowledge of the organization what additional benefits to a company like Johns-Manville would they enjoy as an active member that they would not have had as an associate member?

A They could vote on things, I suppose, that was probably the main thing. They could attend meetings, that might be the other thing.

Q That's your understanding?

A I believe that's it. That's my understanding.

Q Do you recall reviewing any documents that would inform you as to why it would be important in this time period for Johns-Manville to be able to vote on items and attend meetings as an active member?

A No.

Q Then on page 10, moving onto the next presidency in the time period 1957 to 1959, you note that the Data Book and Technical Committee was particularly active holding five
