ample. These islands are smaller white population than the crew of a single cruiser. Naval preparations there were nil. The same goes for the New Hebrides, Caledonia, the Fiji Islands, etc. Navy now formally admits to the status of "bases."

NAVY'S HANDS FULL
Today American sailors and Marines are forced to establish bases and fight a war at the same time. At present with the naval construction program still not fully realized, only enough warships can be sent to the Solomon to push the Japanese slowly westward. Navy hands are very full indeed.

Regarding the losses of ships, the Australian public could be told of the Canberra sinking while Americans were kept ignorant of the losses of three cruisers because the Navy admitted only one and chose for the time being to let the Japs think that the cruiser in question was the Canberra. The Canberra's survivors and wounded sent back from the battle area arrived in Australia before the announcement was made and such a sinking could not therefore be left unadmitted. Until American naval losses, however, were replaced it would have been the height of indiscretion to admit them.

FISHING FOR INFORMATION
To explain why the Navy was unable, after the Japs announced the sinkings of four cruisers, to confirm this statement it must be understood that the Japanese announcement, however far or near from the truth they may be, are not announcements alone but inquiries. The Jap naval intelligence is actually saying to us: "We think we sank four cruisers; how about it?"

Communications regarding progressive clashes should not be considered absolute or complete or subject to comparison with losses claimed inflicted on the enemy until an engagement is long over and losses replaced. Uncertainty is a state of mind to which the public must in some degree harden itself. Copyright, 1942, for The Tribune and the Chicago Daily News
