of additional taxes have become major issues in the campaign. Brunker has flatly opposed both of the governor's proposals while Cameron has given a qualified approval to both.

Brunker summed up his stand on water like this:

"I will never vote to surrender a single drop of water from our mountain streams, unless and until, our own local needs, both now and in the future, are satisfied and guaranteed."

Cameron took the position that the senator from the predominately mountain district must "protect the counties of origin."

But, he said, "protection does not mean just stand pat."

Cameron said he would vote for development of large water projects designed to export surplus water to Southern California if "upstream" projects designed to benefit the areas of origin were built at the same time.

Brunker also flatly rejected Brown's request for additional taxes "while there are still funds remaining in special reserves."

Brown wants to use the reserve funds for statewide water development.

Cameron, although he reserved the right to "take a very close look" at tax bills if he became a member of the senate, said he thought he would back "most" of the governor's revenue proposals.

Both Cameron and Brunker are young men. Brunker is 32 years old and Cameron is 41. Both are married and have two children although the Brunkers have another child on the way.

Both have been active in chambers of commerce and civic clubs.
