By using the electronic ray, the actual cooking would be from the inside of the container of food to the outside—or just the reverse of boiling or steaming.
The cost of installing electronic equipment for this type of cooking probably would run fairly high, but canners feel that the speed-up in mass production would tend to offset this factor —especially if a better tasting product resulted.
Electronic engineers say there would be no startling changes in the color of food cooked in this manner. But they emphasize it may be a long time before the

CANNER IN PLASTIC FIELD.
They say, although about 30 to 60 per cent of current tin can output is used for canning vegetables, fruits and similar foods, producers in this field will be prepared for a change. One can maker already has bought two plastic plants. It is pointed out The American Can Company expects a vastly expanded postwar market in America and elsewhere for already popular canned goods.
A product virtually unknown to American housewives will be canned sliced bacon, which has been packed in 24-ounce containers for the armed services.
Continental Can Company says factors which may continue to favor the dehydration industry after the war are:
Community feeding of war ruined countries, distant markets where transportation represents a sizable portion of finished product cost and technological advancement of some current methods of dehydration.
