By CHARLES P. WEIKEL
Regional Representative
U.S. Administration On Aging

The peaker was the coordinator of services for older adults in Marin County, California; his audience, an attentive city council to whom he was attempting to sell the idea of countywide planning for older residents.

"Even employes approaching retirement age," the county coordinator went on, "like the idea, but largely because they haven't the faintest realization of its personal dangers to them, of what they'll live on or HOW they will live for another 10 to 30 years or so."

After stressing the necessity for the cities to take the lead to lean upon."
