me. I don't blame him. Kids can ask questions that nobody on earth can answer.

For fear this would happen to me, I snuck out and went upstairs to City Manager Al Coons' office, but not before I glanced over the group and got a line on what was doing.

They were hearing how things worked and how much fires had cost the city in the past year, and plenty of that sort of information. A number were taking notes.

This recalls to me the methods that were used in my early high school days, and I always like to compare them with modern methods so that the kids will really get a bird's eye view of the educational situation.

In my day, I never remember any class going anywhere to learn anything, although I once went to a football game in Los Gatos with a teacher whose car stalled on a car track, and I learned the value of brakes and some judgement in driving. The place we went to learn things was into a big study hall, and my desk was in front of a funny big ventilator that blew a steady flag of cobwebs out and had halitosis.

I spent a great deal of time in study hall with my collar turned up and a stiff neck, which made the monitor mad, and for which I was given an extra period in study hall after school with my collar turned up. I complained about the cold and dank breath of the ventilator, and got into kind of a squabble with the monitor (a good boy) and the principal came in and sentenced me to an extra 20 minutes in study hall.

They didn't let me move from in front of the ventilator. It kept waving its long gray cobwebs at me, and I kept my collar turned up on the theory that another that may have been part of the tail of the Giacobini-Zinner Comet was being studied today by science instructors at Phoenix Junior College. The fragment was found yesterday on a roof of a house south of the city.
