Dear Doctor Kehoe:

Thank you for your very informative letter of March 28.

We would like to have our research man stop down to see you and discuss our problem in more detail. However, before arranging an appointment we have one question which we hope you will not consider out of order.

Is it necessary for your institution to publish the results of any work you do? There is nothing very secretive about what we are trying to accomplish but on the other hand we would have no patent protection and our only advantage in making quite an investment in developing a new product is that we might get a head start of a year or two over other people.

We will be glad to hear from you further at your convenience.

Yours truly
