Dear Doctor Teegarden:

I have just had a request from the Texas Company for information and for a copy of my letter to you concerning Mr. [REDACTED]. This I have declined to do until and unless you give your consent. I have had no further information about this case, nor do I know what action, if any, you have taken with regard to his illness. I should hesitate to betray your very complete and frank confidence by passing along to the Texas Company any information which you have given me which for any reason you would prefer to withhold.

I would appreciate it very much if you would drop me a line, letting me know what your reaction is in the matter and, specifically, whether or not you are willing for me to send a copy of my letter to you to the Texas Company. I do not make a practice of sending copies of my correspondence with physicians to the management of various industries with whom we have direct or indirect contact, nor do I supply them with detailed records on cases. I am, of course, quite willing to give out any general information so long as I can do so without violating any professional confidence.

With kindest personal regards,

Very truly yours,

RAK:is
