silk screen process has been used commercially for printing banners and posters for the past forty years. In 1914 or 1915, a San Francisco artist, John Pilsworth, developed a multi-color process. A year later a man named Owens patented this method under the name of "Selectasine." This new process spread East, and, by experimenting, new and less painstaking methods were discovered.

At this time the process was guarded as a trade secret and the work was sold as an original hand-painted product. However, craftsmen became interested in the method and the secret soon became known. Thereafter, silk screening grew rapidly and has been developed into a highly efficient method of reproduction during the past twenty years.

First Showing

Artists soon realized that this new process could be used for the fine arts. In 1930, Guy Maccoy and his wife, Geno Pettit, having completed a commercial silk screen assignment, a great hand, gaily, which creati with After compl design graph rary / in 193 Seri design stract own frame ward, appro
