

problem of seasonal unemployment among agricultural workers is being tried in Fresno county.

A representative of the welfare department has been assigned to the Huron area on the West Side, where suffering among unemployed farm workers was widespread during the slack period of last year.

His duties, Welfare Director A. Jensen said, will be to operate with growers and the state Department of Employment in finding work for the unemployed. He will remain in the area until the demand for farm workers picks up again, when the middle of April and first of May.

We are trying to do something constructive instead of just handing out groceries," said Jensen.

The welfare director declared that conditions around Huron "nothing like" what they were last year. For one thing, cotton harvest has lasted much longer. And Jensen said workers have tried to space what work is available so that workers could be employed at least part of the year.

Jensen said, however, it is impossible to tell what the unemployment will be.

March and April.
