in this case, is that the type of information that you normally rely on to prepare your reports?

A That is one body of information. That is the information on the individual. And since we are making projections into the future, we rely on published data by government agencies in order to get some sense of what the future economic outlook of the economy would be and the role of a particular individual in that economic outlook.

Q And can you describe for us briefly the methodology or the general approach you use in analyzing one of these cases, or this case in particular?

A Okay. This case in particular, this is what is referred to as a wrongful death case, and the first -- there are two things we are trying to measure, and they are related, but they are somewhat distinct.

And one is the actual loss of earnings as a result of an untimely death, and the other is loss of earning capacity.
