America needs to step up the military to keep China at bay

Dan Blumenthal | The Hill

China's grand strategy requires much of its military and security forces. It is no surprise that China has engaged in a vast, ambitious military modernization program, even as almost all other countries have significantly slowed their defense spending, including the United States. History will likely not look kindly on the US military drawdown during the same years Washington became more concerned with China.

Tax reform might tell us whether the individual mandate really works

Benedic N. Ippolito | AEIdeas

Few elements of the Affordable Care Act inspire as much controversy as the individual mandate — the requirement that all individuals buy health insurance or face a government-imposed penalty. Despite all the focus on the mandate, we don't really know whether it did much to expand insurance coverage. We may soon have the answer.

Don't be fooled by 'secular stagnation'

Phil Gramm and Mike Solon | The Wall Street Journal

"Secular stagnation," a belief that America has fallen into a persistent state of low growth and investment, calls into question whether the American economy can grow by more than 2 percent over the next decade. Secular stagnation is a political excuse for bad policies that we don't have to accept. We need better policies.

Watch: Islamist militancy in Africa

Emily Estelle | AEI video

There's been a rise of Islamist militancy across Africa in recent years, creating a growing threat to the US and Europe. There's a dangerous misconception that African militant groups are too locally focused to pose a threat. The US should understand that addressing the challenge now is far cheaper than fighting another war later.
