REPORTER ED O'MALLEY: "And precautionary moves by the Public Service Company in Boulder have paid off. On Monday, dirt was removed from the Public Service yard to be analyzed. And the dirt does contain the industrial toxic chemical PCB. But The Environmental Protection Agency calls the amount minute--saying it's no danger. The contaminated soil will be used as landfill material somewhere on the Public Service Company's own property."

REPORTER: "The Public Service Company says trace amounts of PCB have been confirmed in some dirt scraped from a supply yard in Boulder. A spokesman for the company says the amounts of PCB were minute and were well below the contamination levels set by The Environmental Protection Agency. The soil was taken from the yard outside the utility's Boulder Service Center, where some transformers and capacitors were stored. Some of them contained PCB, which has been proved to be a cancer-causing agent."
