

his batting in and averages today.
 Zamski, 28, lashed four hits in Boston's final, 5-1 victory over Minnesota Sunday became only the 11th in baseball history to take the batting title.
 He batted with a .326

a Triple Crown winner even though he tied in one category. There's a precedence for it. One for The Book, an official list of baseball records, recognized Joe Medwick of the St. Louis Cardinals as the Triple Crown winner in 1937, when he led in batting and runs batted in, but tied with Mel Ott for the home run title.

Frank Robinson of Baltimore, who took the Triple Crown last year, was second in batting at .311, with Killebrew second in runs batted in at 113.

In the National League, Pittsburgh's Roberto Clemente nailed down his fourth league batting title with a .357 average.

He also won in 1961, 1964 and 1965. Only Stan Musial, Rogers Hornsby and Honus Wagner have won more NL titles.

Clemente, who closed with a triple and a home run, also led the league in hits, 209, and just missed a share of the runs batted in title. He had 110, with Orlando Cepeda of the NL champion Cardinals leading at 111.

Briles of St. Louis, a relief man turned starter, topped his league at 14-5, 7.97.

Jim Lonborg of Boston, who won the final game, had a 22-9 record and shared with Earl Wilson of Detroit the distinction of most victories in the American League. Wilson had a 22-11 record.

Other 20 game winners were Dean Chance of Minnesota, 20-14, Ferguson Jenkins, Chicago Cubs, 20-13, and Mike McCormick, San Francisco, 22-10.
