Councilmen Take Stand in Gaming Trial

BY DOUG BRUIT
Times Staff Writer

Los Angeles City Councilman Robert J. Stevenson testified at the Chinatown bribery-conspiracy trial Thursday that when he took office in 1969 "there was a general feeling of discontent" in Chinatown about police enforcement of gambling laws.

Other testimony Thursday included statements by three members of the Los Angeles City Council who appeared as character witnesses for the councilman.

Stevenson, 44, who is charged with two counts each of bribery and conspiracy in the alleged establishment of commercial gambling games in Chinatown in 1969, appeared as a witness in his own defense after testimony by his wife, Peggy, and son, Bruce, 15.

Enforcement 'Too Harsh'
Under questioning by his attorney, Douglas H. Dalton, Stevenson said he had learned during his 1969 City Council campaign that many residents of Chinatown felt that gambling laws were being too harshly enforced in Chinatown.

Among the complaints he testified, were allegations that gambling games after large social gatherings were "often broken up" by police who did not have search warrants, who often arrested non-gamblers and who used unnecessary force.

Stevenson also told the 10-man, two-woman jury
