ould run approximately $1,000 a year. With assistance from the sun, the cost is now expected to be about $450 a year. Thus the cost of the solar system may pay for itself within 10 years, and a savings will be achieved thereafter.

However, these figures are not applicable to the average house. In many areas, heating and air conditioning operating costs for an average house will not exceed $450 or $500 a year, particularly where natural gas is available.

Yellott said solar savings in the case of low-cost heating averages probably could not run more than $150 or $200 a year, which may cast some doubt over its economic feasibility. However, the solar system for the so-called average house does not need to be as elaborate as the present experimental project.

Yellott said he also fore-
