testimony from a case of Richard James Boseman?

A Yes.

Q And the question that was asked of you in that case was at line 17. It says, so you wouldn't warn the workers of the hazard they are working around because you don't want to bother them, because you don't want to scare them. And your answer was, wouldn't want to unnecessarily frighten them.

And then the question went on, and that might reduce their productivity, might it, if you unnecessarily frighten them; and the answer was, if it would not be productive to tell them about something, the conventional wisdom of the time, and that was the '30s, '40s, '50s and '60s, what you are saying is that that was not necessarily desirable?

A Within the conventional wisdom at that time, and now put that back into context, you must read much further than that, but those words, indeed, were said there.

Q Is what you are telling us, sir, that the ethics of industrial hygiene have changed from the
