

Started at Chino

CHINO, April 16 (U.S.A.)—Perhaps unknown to many are the beginnings of a new southern California industry. 40 head of karakul, bearing sheep today wandered on the property of Charles J. Wire, near here.

For it is from the pelts of the young lambs that valuable karakul coats are made. In addition, the wool of the adult animal is used extensively in the manufacture of fine robes, blankets and sport coats, and for making yarn used in repair and edging of oriental rugs.

HAIR BLACK AT BIRTH

At birth, the lamb's silky hair is jet black and tightly curled in ringlets. It is then the pelts are most highly valued, and they usually are taken when the lambs are a few days old.

The hair grows rapidly, and by the time the animal is a year old, it is from eight to 12 inches long and nearly straight. Sheared once a year, the older animals have hair 12 to 18 inches long.

After the first year, silver hair begins to appear, and after a few years, the coat becomes gray.

NATIVE OF ASIA

The karakul is a native of Bokhara, a small country in central Asia, directly north of Turkestan and the border provinces of India.

Brought to this country first by the efforts of Theodore Roosevelt, there are not more than 9000 in the U. S. at this time. The karakul pelts range in value from an average of approximately $12 to as high as $30 each.
