TIN MINES

President Harrison Photographed by the Side of Stacks of Tin Pigs.

A Short History of the First and Probably the Last Tin Produced and Sold in the United States.

Recent reports of the exploiting of extensive tin mines in Orange county recall the history of what was known as the Cajalco or Temescal tin mine, situated between Elsinore and Corona, in Riverside county. The Temescal mine was located in what was known as the Rancho Sobrante de San Jacinto, a rancho embracing over 45,000 acres. The mine was said to embrace as many as sixty distinct parallel lodes, which, according to assays and smelter tests, yielded ore going as high as an average of twenty and one-fourth per cent, or eight times as much as the Cornwall ore.

As long ago as 1872, an exhibition of tin from this mine was made at the Mechanics Pavilion fair, San Francisco, and one of the two gold medals awarded that year to the industry promising the greatest results to California was given to this tin, the other going to the Pacific Rolling mills. Out of that tin a dress of type was cast for a San Francisco paper.

In 1890 this rancho was sold to an English company which organized with a capital of two and a half millions. Under the management of E. N. Robinson, a San Francisco man who had been identified with the property from the first, this company proceeded to develop it. Valuable machinery was imported from England, and much money spent in erecting suitable buildings and developing the property. At one time there were upon the pay roll as many as three hundred men. Under this regime the mine produced a mentionable quality of tin, but exactly how much is not known.

On the 15th of June, 1891, 207 bars of tin averaging about 56 pounds each, were offered for sale in San Francisco, this being the first and up to this date, perhaps the last tin of domestic production sold in an American market. When the late Benjamin Harrison, then president, was here in 1891, he was photographed at Corona, then South Riverside, standing beside a stack of tin pigs higher than his head, as an example of what a protective tariff was doing for a domestic industry owned by Englishmen.

It was predicted at the date of the purchase that the company had exchanged English shillings for California gold dollars, and that the rancho would soon be as populous as the district of Cornwall, but within a year after that photograph was taken at Corona, the mines shut down, and they have so remained to the present time. Meanwhile the rancho has been exploited for the products of its soil. The reason for shutting down the mines is not known.

IMPERIAL LANDS.

"The proof of the pudding is in the eating thereof." This old saying is applicable to the fertility of the Imperial lands. Again, "By their fruits shall ye know them." If the ground is not fertile you don't get any fruits, or other farm products. Thousands of acres of lands in the Imperial Settlements have been sown to barley this season, and this crop is now maturing. All agree that this crop is one of the finest ever grown in this state, and to this rule there are practically no exceptions. Some of the first sown now stands thick on the ground and more than waist high. It will yield four tons of hay to the acre. Very soon all the available government land between the two rivers will be gone. Act now.
